DEEP STUFF.

One of these sweet little stories of the eternal struggle of nature and nature's elements, in this up hill struggle of life.

In the beginning, a shrewd dog with his co-partner, an ostrich, concealed in a camera, start out to take pictures and other things. They succeed in getting a lady, who has just finished a few pies, for a photograph. Then they steal her pies and rush rapidly away.

Then we show an example of a cat and a farmer fishing. Both seem to have no luck at first, so we go under water to see what it's all about. There we find a great big whale of a fish trying to catch and eat all the little fish.

One little fish goes and tells General Frog of the underseas police force. The General calls his army together and they start out to conquer the big fish. They line up and tell the whale what's coming to him, and with one big swift forward the whale swallows the entire army.

Right then the faithful worm on the hook of his master the fisherman cat, succeeds in attracting a baby fish from the arms of its mother and nurse. The big hearted cat hauls in the catch, and when he has measured it, decides to return the baby fish into the waters, to go up.

After a time this same cat has some real luck and swings out a real big fish, but it slips off the hook and hits his old pal the farmer right in the face. Right then and there a fight starts, because the darn fool farmer wants to claim the fish as his and the cat and everybody else knows it belongs to the cat.

Well, anyway along come this same dog and his camera, and gets the farmer to pose with his fish, then swipes it away from him. The cat joins the dog and ostrich and they leave the farmer flat.

Aesop Says: "When fishing goes to a man's head it touches a weak spot."
